Microsoft Office 2016 is powered by the .A variety of different techniques and systems have been developed to detect and/or count objects or targets. For example, systems for detecting and/or counting various types of airborne objects may employ an array of optical sensors or the like that detect or detect and count targets based on reflected radiation. In particular, some of these systems may operate by detecting and/or counting a set of targets (e.g., certain types of airborne objects) based on one or more characteristics of reflected radiation from the targets. Some known systems for detecting and/or counting various types of airborne objects may detect and/or count targets based on the responses of an optical sensor array to a radiation beam (e.g., a laser) generated from a radiation source (e.g., a laser). By way of non-limiting example, systems may scan the sensor array using the radiation beam and analyze the responses of the optical sensors to generate data for detecting and/or counting targets. However, these systems may suffer from various limitations and drawbacks such as noise resulting from thermal effects, inadequate laser power, or the like. -lts && test $cross_compiling = yes; then # Linker support is not enabled ld_version=0 : else ld_version= 3da54e8ca3
