The decree, signed Monday by Prime Minister Giuseppe Conte, took effect immediately and expires at the end of July 2021. It enables the authorities to expel non-EU citizens who have been denied entry to Italy for terrorist-related reasons or who were already in the country without authorization. The decree states that the Interior Ministry "shall grant authorization to non-EU nationals, by whatever name, who are suspected of being terrorist organizations or supporters thereof, and any other subversive activities against the national territory, its citizens, institutions or companies, or members of the public order." No further details were given in the decree and it is not yet clear how the authorities will identify suspected terrorists. In a press conference held Monday afternoon, Italian Interior Minister and Deputy Prime Minister Matteo Salvini said, "No one will be able to act in Italy without being identified. We will be able to use our data system and quickly identify anyone who is associated with extremist or subversive organizations," he said. Last week, the Italian government announced that it would begin using a new biometric database to identify, track and monitor every person in the country. Italy's new nationwide identity card, called "La Repubblica," will combine biometric data, including facial scans, fingerprints, iris scans, palm prints, vein patterns, and blood samples. Salvini also stated that the new law was necessary after two Arab nationals in Sicily were arrested earlier this month as suspects in the stabbings of three tourists in Palermo. A court in Rome is considering charges of complicity in terrorism against the two men, whose identities have not been disclosed. Conte, who is also the head of the anti-immigration League party, said that the law is the first of a series of measures the government will introduce. He said that the government will introduce new criminal sanctions in the coming days, such as fining radical groups and individuals. "In the coming days the

You meet a new person. You are now dating this person. How do you know what month is it? The person is wearing a watch. The date on the watch is N, the month is M, and the year is Y. So you ask this person what the month is. What are some other ways of asking this question? A: In general, you can always ask someone else, "What's the month?" This is such a basic, recurring question that a person who knows that they have to keep track of their own month to date or to keep track of time will usually be able to answer it. If you want to stay away from more formal language, you could also ask, "What month is it?" and then go on to say that you want to know when. In my experience, most people will then be able to answer this with one of the possible answers: "It's the first one." "It's the third one." "It's the last one." A: Since you are asking how you would know the date, the simplest method is to ask someone who is already keeping track of the date. If you are seeing someone in a regular relationship you can ask them what day of the week or month it is; if they don't know, they will look it up. If you are starting a new relationship, you can ask them what day of the week or month it is (again, assuming they know the date in the first place). If you want to avoid asking a person you don't know well enough and have no reason to be looking at the date, you can ask a person you do know well enough to look at the date. If they are already keeping track of it, they can tell you what day of the
