Register online For over 70 years people have said: "When Jack and the Beanstalk proves to be a real runaway success, I'll return to my business career." And then, one day, the beanstalk grows to such a height, it causes an avalanche, and buries the business owner under tons of earth. Not even finding a way out doesn't stop the avalanche, but quickly becomes an adaption process. - Unless, that is, you are a creative person who feels like you have a treasure of ideas, but has nowhere to store them, because your home is buried under tons of earth. That is where this company comes in, it offers a possibility to store all your ideas in one place. (The transition between day 1 and day 2 is part of an ongoing planning process). See the future (at least in broad strokes) Most business owners are only thinking about their own future. They are only taking care about their own needs and those who will be part of their business. And it helps if the plans you have in mind are not dependent on a single technology, but exist in a broader technological environment. And not in the one you plan to use, but in the one your business fits into. Often a company that offers a good solution will be able to build the entire thing themselves. But if that is not possible, then they may have to partner with someone who specializes in a piece of the puzzle, or they may come to your company, because they are convinced you have a good grasp of the technical side of things. (Read this with the day 2 presentation in mind). Take feedback on board You don't want to be like the beanstalk's owner who gets a second chance to go out in business, only to go up to the top of the beanstalk, stand there on the edge, not knowing how to leave or where to go. So you must take the feedback of the people who come in contact with you and your products and service. There is a way to get your internal team, your customers and possibly your target audience involved in your planning, rather than dismissing them as irrelevant. Even if they lack the experience of a serial entrepreneur, they can play a key role in determining the future of your business. Your customers are your best ambassadors. They have a firsthand experience
