Preeclampsia is a pregnancy disorder that affects about 5% of all pregnancies. It is recognized as the major cause of perinatal morbidity and mortality worldwide. In preeclampsia, there is an increased risk of developing generalized endothelial dysfunction characterized by vascular inflammation, endothelial activation, and the generation of oxidative stress. In contrast to the proinflammatory or thrombogenic effects, dysregulation of complement activation has been demonstrated to be protective, contributing to maternal tolerance to pregnancy. Therefore, it has been hypothesized that complement activation plays a central role in the pathogenesis of preeclampsia. One of the components of the complement system, complement component 3a (C3a) has proinflammatory properties, whereas activation of the alternative pathway of complement results in anti-inflammatory effects. As impaired placentation plays an important role in the development of preeclampsia, the complement system may represent a possible link between impaired placentation and preeclampsia development. This review will discuss the role of alternative pathway of complement activation in preeclampsia tight end Jimmy Graham has found a home. New Orleans received a boatload of good news earlier in the week when star running back Mark Ingram returned to the field. The quarterback still is not set, with Sean Canfield starting the first game of the season while Taysom Hill will backup Will Glazer for the second consecutive year. Glazer, the sixth pick in the 2008 draft, looked very shaky in his debut. Somewhere, the question nags about "What If?" West Virginia quarterback Geno Smith was anointed after the death of Tyrod Taylor last season, a glimpse into his future. Smith did play two impressive games last year, but is not perfect. That has not prevented rookie Trace McSorley, the two-time national champion, from being thought of as the future of the conference. He lit the room up with a total of 200 passing yards and two touchdowns during a 20-13 victory over Northern Illinois last Saturday. "I am practicing like I am going to play," McSorley said. "I enjoy the competition. I enjoy being able to battle for a spot to get on the field. And then the second game, I like the help that I get from the veterans like Tom Savage and Tony Pike." It might not be long before McSorley joins the Steelers' vaunted traveling damage-control crew. Rather than lose one of the best young quarterbacks in the country when Anthony Gonzalez went down with a season-ending shoulder injury against Northwestern, Kirk Herbstreit received a pleasant surprise when McSorley stepped on the field. "Sometimes, you get a great opportunity for your guy," Herbstreit said. "You don't want to mess up." McSorley is the most impressive quarterback to
