(Monster Camp 1st clear + Sci-Fi Pack)Innovation and Policy in the Asia-Pacific Region Beyond the Nomenclature In response to a recent workshop on Transparency, authors continue the discussion of the value of nomenclature to organizations. This article by Norman S. Lowry of the journal Public Understanding of Science and Technology (PUST) argues the use of the term "transparency" is a "poor substitute" for analysis. He cites research in the journal Nature to illustrate that scientific results are frequently not the sum of all the information necessary to determine whether a claim is valid. He describes this difference in information between the observed and the unobserved as "information bias." For those who wish to hear the rest of his argument, see his essay here. The Use of the Term The volume of economic research and policy focusing on accelerating innovation is growing, but has not yet reached the point at which the language of innovation and economics is formally defined or analyzed. Scholars who specialize in innovation seek to do so by using concepts such as creativity, knowledge creation, learning curves, and network effects to name a few. All are important concepts in their own right; however, each has its own nomenclature. This article explains why it is often easier to classify things by how they are used rather than by what we call them. The authors use a "policy case study" of the World Health Organization to illustrate the meaning of the term "transparency."

It had been an eventful day for Granuaile; her journey from the High Court of the Fey to the Sentient Prey was the longest yet, and she was tired. Thankfully, she didn't need to tend to the pouch, but with all the magic she was producing, a gallon would replenish itself quickly. Unfortunately, since Raoul had taken his eye off of the road, food would be rather difficult to come by, at least until Granuaile found a small village to rest. Granuaile set her flag on the seat beside her, stretching her left wing out along the leather seat's arm. It was an odd feeling, like her arm was permanently attached to her wing via some type of mechanical linkage. She'd bathe in the course of the night and there would be no need for her to wear the sensalite pouch, but Granuaile was used to uncomfortable, inconvenient, and quite seldom boring outings. She took in the sights of the rolling countryside, enjoying its beauty. It had been quite a long trip from New York to Blasian, but Granuaile was content in the knowledge that she could travel the open air planes more efficiently than she could travel the ground. She would set her sights on London again though, and that she made up her mind about once her nerves had calmed down. As Raoul descended the rise from the Blasian side of the mountain range, Granuaile found herself having to consciously remind herself of the flight path. She began to experience a sinking sensation with the thought that if she had been simply flying over the ground instead, her body might have been more focused on checking the altitude. When Granuaile had finally landed on the raised highway, her blue eyes had been wide with fear. She had been perched on a rather narrow point of land at the side of the highway, and had no idea what would happen to her if she let go of the joystick. What she had viewed through her window, however, had been a reminder of the vast expanse of high, wide skyscrapers that filled her home. "Thank god I don't have to do that for a while," she had said, buckling herself into her seat and closing her eyes. Raoul nodded, turning his focus back to the road. "We should be there soon," he said gently. "It'll be me and a good wheel from here on out." Relaxing, Granuaile
