You're just surviving, you're not surviving very well, you're just trying to stay alive, and the zombies, obviously, are coming out and they're hungry, and they're looking for brains. You're the only one that can stop the zombies and save the world from destruction. It's your responsibility. About the Developer NoMoreFakeNews: NoMoreFakeNews is a game development studio based in the UK. It is a small company that has a passion for games, exploring new creativity and pushing gaming limits to new extremes. The title was funded through Kickstarter and is currently available on Steam. More information about the game can be found on the official website, and on the official Facebook page. USGamer: The ELDK's back and it's got a big shiny object in its pocket. The new Unreal Engine 4 UE4 is coming to Linux, bringing the power of first party engines like Unreal and Unity to Linux. We've got a few minutes to talk to Epic's Platform Engineering VP Tim Sweeney about the reasons behind the move, how UE4 will help it integrate Linux into the main Unreal engine and what the future holds. Let's get to it! Steven: You know what's great about having a new engine is people get to start making some really awesome games with it. How do you feel UE4 will help the Linux community get games made? Tim: UE4 is taking a good implementation of a new rendering system, and bringing it out to a larger user base, and then taking that user base into new areas, new areas of development. That's what we're excited about here. At the same time, we're also working on bringing UE4 to the Mac OS X and to Windows, so that we can ensure people make the most interesting games, and get the most out of the technology. Steven: For as long as I can remember, Unreal has been the engine most engine developers can turn to with ease when creating a game. How important do you feel UE4 will be in helping reach new users like the Linux community? Tim: We want to be able to hit the biggest audience in the world as hard as we can, but in parallel, we're also making it so we can hit the biggest audience in the world, with the easiest development. We'll make it as easy as we can to get into the field and get to that second bigger audience. Steven

How to play: If you will play this game, you should also play: Numberline Express! -- And for a more random experience, try: Numberline Orbs -- One of the best parts of my new job (as an accountant for an online magazine) is that I get to play games all day long. (They get to fund the games, so it's not really my job to play them; but it is a nice perk. Another nice perk is that I get to describe what I play and why I like it, in words that you people will understand. Lately, I've been spending a lot of time with this indie game called No Man's Sky. The premise is that you're a space explorer (and a space traveler?) in your spaceship with your ship's AI, and you can pilot your ship through space. The goal is to explore and to hunt. You can find resources, trade resources, customize your ship, and build outposts in space. You can even attach to other players' bases to trade stuff! It's a silly game, and it's just a ton of fun to play. But it really does feel like a new kind of experience in gaming. It's a game that takes the old problem of developing the first-person shooter, and makes it into a problem that we haven't seen in a decade or more: what do you do when you want to explore the world? To learn more about No Man's Sky, check out IGN's preview. And if you want to get your hands on the game, you can buy it on PlayStation 4 for $60. Story and gameplay: What makes No Man's Sky a lot of fun is that it has no story. And it never tried to pretend it had a story. This old-school approach to the game is one of the game's biggest strengths; it just wants to let you play and explore, and see what you can find. There's no real in-game narrative. Because of that

For a limited time only, you can download this brand-new STU-1, Multipla and Expert Class MP7 Loco Simulator! The Dispolok BR 189 loco is the first new loco introduced into the store and is available for every type of user. The Dispolok BR 189 loco has a good number of improvements over the BR 141 loco. It has a working pantograph which will allow you to get your loco working in front of a train. The loco has a new frame and loco body and looks almost as good as the BR 141! It has new speedometers, turn tables and more, allowing you to enjoy your new loco much more. The Dispolok BR 189 loco has 4 variants. In the Historic version, you will find 4 different Colour-Scenes. In the Real version, you will find the loco on a real track in Pipiwraith, and two will be running on Germany-tracks (Köln and Hannover). Once again, there is an Event version in the real tracks, except this time there will be locos from the Historic version too. This time there will only be one track, with 4 different colour-scenes. This is the second update for the multi class MP7 locos, and should be used on the Expert Class and Multipla type machines. In the previous version of the locos, the cockpits weren't as detailed as the ones on the BR 141 loco, so you could have forgotten what was what. The Cockpit update does change this slightly, and has been upgraded so that it reflects the BR 141 Cockpit. Each variant now has a Cockpit introduced, allowing you to see exactly what the loco contains. This allows you to choose between various colours, loco decals, frames, details, or even mechanical sights. The Cockpit allows you to add many different variations on the kits, so the decals, frames, details and even the cockpits can be changed to your liking. The track dimensions are based on the complete loco, and the wheels are fully automatic. The overhaul makes sure that the loco will run on the updated track. This new MP7 differs from the BR 141 loco in that it has more inlets on the top. All MP7 locos are getting this overhaul, and the rest of the locos will have both top inlets

2-oz bottle of “Premium Salmon Oil” (fish oil?). I was JUST at Illayat Chemical when it was closed and the lighting is always poor so I don’t know much about it, just the words NEW and LONDON and CARI and MALAYSIA. According to Wikipedia: “Oxidized By-Products (OBP) are two-some free radicals, that cause change to the molecular structure of protein. The by-products could result from the reaction of the oxygen molecule with the dopamine and ascorbic acid molecule. The by-products may also results from the interaction of free radicals are formed with the consumption of oxygen and the phenomenon of ROS (Reactive Oxygen Species).” Oh. I don’t know so much about the “Oxidized By-Products (OBP)” in that product. I do know that UNSEEN comes out on Feb. 22, 2012. A quick look through their website confirms that it was received and bottled by Hyland’s in Toronto on or about Jan. 20-22, 2012, which would mean that they received it just three weeks ago. I’m pretty sure the FDA won’t be happy about this. Here’s the description given by the manufacture: “An essential organic nutrient listed by Solanum Plant, is a pure source of omega-3 fatty acid, essential for good mental and physical health. It nurtures the whole body, enhancing the skin and hair as well as the cardiovascular and immune systems. UNSEEN is certified gluten-free, vegan, vegetarian, non-gmo and GMO free.” That can’t be right, or in you would be the manufacturer of an organic food product, you’d know it would be. I think we can all dispense with that. INOCOLEFA.COM, the publisher of the UNSEEN label, says it all: “The quality of nutrients varies from lot to lot. Customers should
