* Brushes: Brush options * Drawing tools: Pencils, pens, etc. Any image editing software lets you do this, but Photoshop does it in a nice way. You get the brush at the top of the Layer dialog box (Figure 1-14) that allows you to choose the tool you want to use, and then select the image area in the canvas. Figure 1-14. Here you can see the Brush tool. You can choose any of the available brush types. The same effect can be created by using a Clipping Path or by deleting a part of the image. To paint, you use the primary, secondary, and tertiary. The primary is for painting over pixels, the secondary is for copying pixels from an existing area, and the tertiary is for erasing pixels. You can adjust opacity and hardness of the brush. If you need to change an existing image's color, you can copy the pixels from another area on the same image layer (Figure 1-15). Figure 1-15. Use the brush tool to change the color of existing pixels on an image. In another example, you can use the special Clone Stamp tool to copy pixels from an area of another layer. This is handy for recreating old images or even backgrounds. If you need to remove a part of the image, you can use the eraser tool, which is located below the primary brush. You may find it tricky to use these tools for specific image editing tasks. Some things, like erasing an area of the photo, can be done by deleting a part of the photo. Other Photoshop tools, like the Clone Stamp, work by duplicating another part of the photo on top of the original area of the image. However, Photoshop enables you to combine these tools into single operations. In addition to making your edits more efficient, you can also edit multiple layers by pressing the spacebar, as shown in Figure 1-16. This allows you to work on multiple layers at once. Figure 1-16. Use the spacebar to edit multiple layers at once. This chapter will teach you the basic tools and tricks. Once you know how to use them, you can use them for any image editing project you want to do. # About the Format The full name of the file type is called PSD. The PSD stands for Photoshop Document, but most people use it as an abbreviation of Photoshop

Q: How do I configure the default selection in a DataGrid with Spring Data Neo4j? I want to use Neo4j in the backend for MongoDB, and have the Spring Data for MongoDB integration. I have a DataGrid populated with some elements. To assign a value to it I use the setSelectedAttribute(String value) method. When I save the content of the grid to the database, Spring Data will replace the old attribute with the new one. The problem is that this happens in a default way. I want the default selection on the first row. How can I achieve this? I created a simple example of the error: A: The expected behavior is explained in the setSelectedAttribute(String value) javadoc: sets the currently selected attribute value on the given JavaBean object to the given value. The selection is cleared if the given value is null. Instead of just setting the attribute, set the selection. @PostMapping public ResponseEntity save() { Customer savedCustomer = customerRepository.save(customer); Set customerSet = new HashSet(); customerSet.add(savedCustomer); customerSet.addAll(customer); customerRepository.save(savedCustomer, customerSet); // Set the selection to the first row Customer.CustomerOptions customerOptions = (Customer.CustomerOptions) customer.getCustomerOptions(); customerOptions.setSelected(true); return new ResponseEntity(savedCustomer, HttpStatus.CREATED); } import React, { Component } from'react'; import { StyleSheet } from'react-native'; export default class Snackbar extends Component { render() { return ({this.props.children}
