Harbison in band with The Velvet Underground, The Damned, the Stooges This article appeared in the July 9, 1989 issue of The Village Voice. The Velvet Underground (a.k.a. VU, the band's initialism) is the first full-time, perpetual casualty in the growing youth-culture phenomenon. The four-piece, which hails from North Hollywood, left its Wisconsin base in '84 to play only punk rock, as their name implies, and hair metal, as their fans know. The group signed with Geffen, but not even a string of concert dates in the U.S., far-reaching European touring, MTV exposure or an appearance on the "Unplugged" album could dissuade the critics: VU was reduced to opening for the likes of Alice Cooper, Poison and Mötley Crüe. The most lethal blow, however, was the band's clash with the musical establishment: in '87, after touring with Annabella Lwin, VU found itself included on the Mercury nomination list for the Grammy Awards.

(Popular-vote winners are determined by a panel of judges.) The top six votes would go to the top six (or five, depending on the year) artists on the record-buying public's list, and the rest would sort themselves out by the number of times they were mentioned. VU has been included in the list nearly every year since, and every year, more nominations than the others. In '87, for instance, they were on the list with everyone from Tears for Fears and the Police to Living Colour, Toto and Prince.

Then, when the nominations were tallied, VU was the winner, with 11,456 popular votes, a more-than-three-fold increase over any of its other years on the ballot. The other four nods were two apiece for the Police and Tears for Fears, five for Prince and Living Colour, and 10 for Toto. The backlash against VU began even before the band set foot in Los Angeles. Some questioned the group's musical affinity for the 1960s; the majority of the band members were too young to have experienced the canon of krautrock or the punk trailblazers they were to revive. V

A: You should generate the token on the server side, because there is no way to send a resource on the client side in a secure way. You can use the session token on the client side, but I don't recommend that. I suggest generating a token only for your own users. Client: generate the token set the token as a cookie on the client and send it to the server Server: decode the cookie and get the token validate the token against your database (and perhaps against other validations in your application) save the user P.S. Just my 2 cents. I don't know what kind of authentication you are doing, but it is important that you know that if a user is logged in, you don't need to authenticate every request. Only the important ones (your admins, for example). EDIT: response to the comment A user want to login from an app, but he already using facebook. In this case, Facebook doesn't authenticate the user using oauth. Facebook only set session cookie which is stored to the client. In this case, I want my app to create and set a cookie as well to store user information. I want to use the token of this cookie to get the information If I understand your question correctly, you want to capture the user sessions in your application, right? The problem with this is that you need to generate the token on the server side, so the user's session is not captured. So how does your application "capture" the user's sessions if the user already uses Facebook and don't authenticate the user? That's what you are asking, right? Maybe I am misunderstanding. What I suggest is this: Client: authenticate the user (yours server side) set the cookie containing the session token on the client Server: decode the cookie and get the session token validate the token against your database (and perhaps against other validations in your application) save the user Q: Regex - Match first uppercase letter from the last item in line I want to replace the first uppercase letter from the last item in the line. Example (this would be the desired effect): List ITEMS = new List(); Should
