Since I wrote that piece a few years ago, I’ve been hearing two increasing and increasingly common forms of objection to including non-medical impairments as disabilities. First, there are the strawman arguments that refer to my criticism of past definitions as “that ol’ tired, old, invalid definition argument.” Those who make those arguments are really simply assuring you that they’ve thought hard about your previous post and that they’ve finally found something nugatory that you said but don’t realize you actually said. Second, the arguments that refer to my position as “invalid”: that’s a term of art used by liberals and people who have privileges that liberals and people without privileges don’t have. For example, see this tweet: Pretty fucking glib, Greg, no? And yet I still hear it with regularity — always from liberals, and often from people who have disabilities. When someone like me objects to definitions of disability like “physical or mental impairment”, too often, these are the sorts of people who get into Twitter fights with us on the subject. These are, of course, not people with disabilities. They have never been disabled. They have never worked for a living because they have never been able to. They have never lost their child because they have never seen a doctor. They have never been rejected by a manager because they have no written note from a doctor. If they have a disability, it’s invisible to them. If the word “disabled” means “people without privileges” to them, so be it. They simply won’t be bothered by the truth. I say “too often”
