The prescription drugs market has been a consistent growth market in terms of the gross product value for over a decade. The current international competitive landscape suggests that the ability to generate higher revenues without a significant uplift in prices will be the key determinant in driving the market forward in the medium term. This gives prescription drugs a unique position in the pharmaceutical industry, where price remains the primary consideration for both clinicians and patients, with successful uptake of innovative products likely to depend more on value for money than on potential for innovation. Pricing strategies are discussed in relation to conventional drugs, drugs in special categories, potential drug'reformulation' and the role of third party payers. The drivers for the growth of the prescription drugs market include: improvements in the state of the economy, an aging population, marketing innovations, the introduction of new and emerging biopharmaceuticals, a penetration of generic substitution and the increased volume of insurance claims and claims processing. The authors also discuss the impact of new pricing and reimbursement mechanisms and the role of the US health insurance industry, with particular attention being given to the implications for managed care and Medicare. Mutant coagulation factor V arising from a homozygous autosomal recessive mutation in a Japanese patient with hemophilia B. Hemophilia B is an X-linked bleeding disorder caused by a deficiency of factor V (FV) activity. A patient with mild hemophilia B was found to be homozygous for a novel FV mutation consisting of 2 single base substitutions: the common mutation c.4618C>T (p.R1540W), and an unusual mutation c.1528G>T (p.R510L).
