Q: Is there a difference between "new" and "new" in Javascript? I started learning JavaScript a little bit ago and I'm trying to understand what this new keyword does. For instance, why `var x = new function() {}`; is not the same as `var x = function() {}`; I've searched the web and the Mozilla Developer Network for an explanation but I can't find anything. A: There is no difference because both are new objects. From Mozilla Doc: The keyword `new` creates a new JavaScript object, if there is a type argument. Otherwise, it calls a constructor with no explicit argument. In your first case, you are explicitly calling a constructor.

In the second, there is no constructor defined so it is implicitly called. A: `new` is a function, but it has a special meaning when used inside an object definition: it constructs an object using a constructor function. For example, let's consider the following function: `function Rectangle(width, height) { this.width = width; this.height = height; this.area = width * height; }` This function is a constructor function. It can be called like a function, but it also has properties and methods associated with the object it creates. For example: `var rectangle = new Rectangle(100, 200)`; Now that we have an object, we can look at its properties: `alert(rectangle.width); // 100` `alert(rectangle.height); // 200` `alert(rectangle. 6d1f23a050`
