I recommend the P3D v4 client as the best fit for the flight simulation genre. It's the only client that offers real-time weather conditions and, as a result, I feel that it provides a much more realistic flight experience. Of the several flight simulators I've used, only P3D allows me to fly in clear skies, or at least very transparent skies, which is one of the most important factors to consider if you value a realistic and immersive flying experience. The client comes with a bunch of great aircraft and scenery, but I also use some of my own scenery for my own airplane builds. P3D has a built-in iPad port that I like a lot as it makes it easy to quickly port screen shots or share clips with my other flight simulator users. I also use it to log and track my flight hours which is one of my favorite features of the client. Finally, I like P3D's capacity to export 3D objects to Google Earth which makes it very easy to quickly share a short clip of my favorite flight with my friends or family. Prepar3D includes many features that are both for beginners and for experienced simmers. In addition, there is a feature set that allows professional users to easily create their own high quality content that is tailored to their needs. It includes features that allow flight simulation content creators to build and export highly realistic 3D terrain, buildings, and aircraft. It also includes a system for creating scenery that also works with multiple flightsim engines. Preparing a virtual environment for a flight simulator allows users to enjoy highly realistic flight experiences in many different scenarios. The Results page in P3D gives users a complete overview of their work, including a perspective view of the terrain, ground and sky with all elements of the scenery and content selected as well as a simulated view from their aircraft. 5ec8ef588b
