normally, the protocol used with snmp is a fairly stateless protocol. since the simplest version of snmp supports a query-only model, no agent is needed for the cisco-config-mib. the snmp-nbi snmpd process provides the interface between the public and the private mibs. as a result, the public mibs can be queried or viewed via snmpget. the public mibs are used for device discovery (agent-based) and monitoring (snmp-nbi-server), while the private mibs are used for device configuration (agent-based)

and management (snmp-trap). configure snmp traps on your switch by using the trap directive in the switch startup configuration. the trap directive consists of a list of mibs. the list of mibs is represented by statements in the form of mib-module option mib-name. if no options are given, a default set of mibs are used. mib-name is a mib in the context of the switch. the mib-name would have the form community string mib-name. the following example shows the trap directive for a switch in the private mib: trap table system.enterprise .private.cisco_ios_configs mib-root mib-root ::cisco-ios-xe-oper:system-enterpris edition2epdfdownload trapping is done by sending an snmp message to a management station (server). the management station replies to the snmp message and informs the switch that it is ready to receive configuration information. if configuration information is to be sent to the switch, the management station sends the information to the switch. cisco a-vlan also includes a program called snmpadmin to manage cisco devices via snmp. 5ec8ef588b
