Multi-way faecal microflora profiling reveals distinct human gut microbial composition in adults with and without celiac disease. Celiac disease (CD) is a genetic condition that is associated with sensitivity to dietary gluten exposure and is the most common cause of chronic small bowel inflammation in Western countries. The precise pathogenesis of CD is unclear but it is thought to involve dysbiosis of the gut microbiota. The objective of the study was to investigate whether the microbiota of adult patients with CD differ from the microbiota of healthy individuals in order to gain insights into the relationship between the microbiota and disease. Fecal samples were collected from adult ( $\geq 18$  years) individuals, classified as having ( $n = 10$ ) or not having ( $n = 10$ ) CD, and these samples were examined using high-throughput 16S rRNA gene amplicon sequencing. Furthermore, the association between the faecal microbiota and the functional gene categories also was determined. There was a clear difference in composition between patients with and without CD. The CD microbiome was enriched in Prevotella, which occurred in the microbial signature of adult patients with CD. Furthermore, the dysbiosis of the CD microbiome is associated with an increase in the abundance of genes associated with metabolism of polysaccharides, anaerobic digestion, glycan degradation and formation of short chain fatty acids. This investigation of the intestinal microbiome in adult celiac patients provides novel insights into the link between the gut microbiota and the pathogenesis of CD. We show that there is a distinct microbiome in adults with CD, which includes an increased prevalence of Prevotella. Our findings highlight the importance of functional metagenomics in the study of the intestinal microbiota.
